Session Summary

This workshop session explores which population policies are needed to help create ecologically sustainable societies in the United States and around the world. It begins with a short, stage-setting presentation on recent global demographic and ecological trends. Participants will then break into groups to consider a specific population policy choice faced by a particular nation, working to find consensus on the best policy (or range of policies). Finally, the group will reconvene as a whole to discuss answers and consider whether any general principles have emerged about the way forward regarding population matters and ecological sustainability.
